I continue to shape
Sept 5—Dec 8, 2018
Works by

Maria Thereza Alves, Cathy Busby, Justine A. Chambers with Deanna Bowen + Ame Henderson + Jessica Karuhanga, Nicholas Galanin, Lisa Myers, Mickalene Thomas, Joseph Tisiga, and Charlene Vickers with an additional collaboration with Maria Hupfield

Curated by cheyanne turions
I continue to shape
History, like all stories, is told slant, subject to distortion by those with the power to represent it. In the telling, certain characters are foregrounded and certain power dynamics are obscured, leaving certain other characters—their perspectives and experiences—cast out of this immortal glow.

And yet, it seems that aesthetic practices bear a specific capacity to transform the sediment of history into something moving once again, to puncture what seems solid, to redirect the light.

The capacity for artworks to provoke this kind of shift is often tied to their ability to conjure visceral and intuitive responses that percolate through the viewer, from a change in mood or disposition, to an evolving understanding of the relation between actors, objects and society. Philosopher and artist David Garneau has coined the term “extra-rational aesthetic action” to describe the possibilities that reside in encounter with works of this sort. Drawing upon Garneau’s study, I continue to shape considers how the extra-rational capacities of art can support interruptions of history such that new kinds of stories become possible to tell.

Sometimes these interruptions are worn on the surface, such as when iconic images from art history and popular culture are radically reconfigured. When Nicholas Galanin juxtaposes a headshot of Carrie Fisher as Princess Leia with an Edward Curtis portrait of an unnamed Hopi-Tewa woman in the photo collage Things Are Looking Native, Native’s Looking Whiter (2012), he displays how an ongoing colonial project in North America takes Indigenous cultures as raw material to appropriate. Joseph Tsiga’s Props for Reconciliation series (2017) sets characters from the Archie universe in dialogue with representational tropes from Indigenous cultures. If the comic-book characters appear too much at home, the Indigenous characters and cultural forms fade from the surface, displaying the destructive effects of what Archie and his friends, no doubt, imagine as only good-natured skill sharing and curiosity. Mickalene Thomas’s Origin of the Universe I (2012) reconfigures Gustav Courbet’s L’Origine du monde (1866) with the image of a Black woman and expands the scope of the image’s originary claim from the world to the universe. Adorned with rhinestones and produced as a self-portrait, the work detours a classic example of female objectification into a powerful act of self-determination, claiming representational agency as the artist’s own. With these works, the extra-rational takes root in the quick recognition of disrupted forms; resisting colonial containment, they trade instead in a deep investment in the effects of cultures in collision.

Against the maxim that history repeats itself as a kind of self-fulfilling prophecy, it is possible to approach inheritance as a means of activating the present anew. Maria Thereza Alves’s Nowhere (1991) charts the force of European ideas of utopia, and their destructive effects on Indigenous life and lands across the globe. Photographic images depicting places of colonial plunder (such as Amazonas, Brazil) are disrupted by overpainting and two-by-fours, disturbing the idealizations of site that colonization depends upon. Within this interruption is contained an argument for engagement with the social and political contexts that actually already exist instead. In this place—Canada—there is an urgency for this kind of attention to the gruesome legacy of settler colonialism in general, and residential schooling in particular. Cathy Busby’s WE CALL (2017) functions as a mnemonic device. Editing and reproducing calls to action from the Truth and Reconciliation Commission’s final report that address academic and cultural institutions, as well as their governing and funding bodies, this pair of wall-text panels loudly reminds us of our living duties to this ongoing history. Across Alves’s and Busby’s propositions for belonging, which counter narratives of nation building, there is critical investment in the extra-rational as a means of acknowledging “the perpetual struggle to make both Indigenous and settler people aware of the complexity of our shared colonial condition, and how this legacy informs every person and institution in these territories.”

The survival tactics of those who are subject to systemic violence are varied. Charlene Vickers goes for armatures that lack subtlety: Diviners (2012) are a set of 10-foot long sharpened cedar spears, reminiscent of porcupine quills. By invoking a quill’s power of deterrence, the Diviners function as medicine, extending the body through an outsized identification with our animal kin and their modes of protection, healing... and sustenance. In a quieter way, Lisa Myers employs processes of straining and absorbing as metaphors for social interaction and personal endurance. What needs to be left behind, and what must be taken forward? In the creation of her blueprints—silkscreened images created with the anthocyanin pigment of blueberries—the pulp of a wild fruit is passed through a sieve to become an unstable ink, mapping its own forms of life. Continually changing colour, the pigment responds to the material composition of the paper and exposure to light, just as any being in transformed by the conditions of their environment.

If the extra-rational potential of artworks can change minds and behaviours, it is important to tend to the affective labour involved in this. Justine Chambers offers a place of rest through a malleable scenography that invites gallery visitors to reconfigure it as they see fit, and allow their bodies to unfurl. It recognizes flesh as a way of understanding being in relation with bodies past, present and future. Over the course of the exhibition, Chambers has invited artists Deanna Bowen, Ame Henderson and Jessica Karuhanga to activate her work, so as to relay the nature of the work as, in Garneau’s words, a place of “sensual and intuitive study ... where people can find refuge from the ideas that otherwise rule them.”

The title of the exhibition references Galanin’s observation that contemporary Indigenous cultures, like all other cultures, exist on a continuum of change based on engagements with others and in dialogue with land. The “I” of I continue to shape is both the artist’s subjectivity bearing upon the world, as much as it is the “I” of the viewer, coming to terms with how else to understand their role in upholding or dismantling the structures we have inherited, and to shape new personal and cultural relationships. By challenging colonial habits and tending to the labour that such re-orientation implies, I continue to shape looks to the breadth of that “I” for a shared agency in shaping a world more tender, more just and more unsettled than the world we have now.

---

1 These fabric works were made as a portable iteration to accompany related gatherings, while the pair of wall-text paintings were displayed at the Teck Gallery at Simon Fraser University during their year-long display (2017–18).

3 Garneau, 15–16.

Opening Event

Reception
Wednesday, September 5, 2018, 6-8pm
With performance by Charlene Vickers, 7pm
Hart House Quad

Public Programs

Activation: Furniture and Objects
Saturday, September 8, 2018, 2pm
A choreographic score with furniture/objects
by Justine Chambers
University of Toronto Art Centre

Conversation
Saturday, September 8, 2018, 3pm
Featuring Justine Chambers, cheyanne turions and Charlene Vickers
University of Toronto Art Centre

Activation: Furniture and Objects
Wednesday, October 3, 2018, 6pm
Featuring Jessica Karuhanga
University of Toronto Art Centre

Curatorial Tour
Saturday, October 20, 2018, 2pm
Featuring cheyanne turions
University of Toronto Art Centre

Activation: Furniture and Objects
Friday, October 26, 2018, 2pm
Featuring Deanna Bowen
University of Toronto Art Centre

Activation: Furniture and Objects
Wednesday, November 21, 2018, 6pm
Featuring Ame Henderson
University of Toronto Art Centre

Drop-In Tours
Every Friday, 2pm
University of Toronto Art Centre

For program details visit artmuseum.utoronto.ca

Visiting the Art Museum

Justina M. Barnicke Gallery
7 Hart House Circle
Toronto, Ontario M5S 3H3
416.978.8398

University of Toronto Art Centre
15 King’s College Circle
Toronto, Ontario M5S 3H7
416.978.8398

Wheelchair-accessible access to University College, and therefore the Art Museum’s University of Toronto Art Centre location will be closed due to University College building revitalization.

Tuesday Noon–5:00 PM
Wednesday Noon–8:00 PM
Thursday Noon–5:00 PM
Friday Noon–5:00 PM
Saturday Noon–5:00 PM
Sunday Closed
Monday Closed

Closed on statutory holidays. Class tours and group bookings by appointment. Admission is FREE.

artmuseum@utoronto.ca
artmuseum.utoronto.ca
@artmuseumuoft

Staff

Barbara Fischer, Executive Director/
Chief Curator
Sarah Robayo Sheridan, Curator
John G. Hampton, Adjunct Curator
Rebecca Gimmi, Program Coordinator
Maureen Smith, Business & Programs Coordinator
Heather Darling Piggat, Collections Manager
Esther Simmonds-MacAdam, Exhibition Coordinator
Chiara Cavaliere, Gallery Attendant
Brittany Brooks, Communications Assistant

Exhibition Technicians: Jasper Akit, Alexandra Chacinski, Dax Morrison

Brand Design: Underline Studio
Printing: Flash Reproductions

Map of Toronto showing university locations and subway stations.